Criminal Cases. A person accused of a crime is generally charged in a formal accusation called an indictment (for felonies or serious crimes) or information (for misdemeanors). The government, on behalf of the people of the United States, prosecutes the case through the United States Attorney's Office if the person is charged with a federal crime.

Civil Cases vs. Criminal Cases: Key Differences - FindLaw
Civil law is concerned with any harm or infringement of individual rights. As against this, the criminal law is all about the acts which law defines as offenses. In civil law, the aggrieved party or complainant sues the other party, whereas, in the case of criminal law, an individual is prosecuted for committing a crime in the court of law.
