The main premise of Literary Translation and the Rediscovery of Reading is thus to demonstrate the relevance of literary translation as a manifestation of Scott's version of intralingual reading, precisely in order to theorize "the literariness of the translational act itself." According to Scott, while traditional approaches to interlingual translation assume a linguistic ignorance of the source language by a potential monolingual reader, his own approach to translation aims to ...

If Rediscovery of Reading presents the nuts, bolts, screwdrivers, and hammers of the experimental toolkit, then the Perception of Text volume is a trenchant defence of the ways the experimental style might be the only true phenomenological form of translation, if we take seriously Merleau-Ponty's concept of the horizon of significance as style which surrounds each and every object in the world when perceived. Scott's radical forms of englishing, which involve overwriting, supplementing bare ...
