The plates are shifting right under our noses, cracking the very foundations of our world and creating an insidious Fissure that seems both infinite and formless. This divide is not a geographical erosion but rather the fragmentation of our shared reality. The Fissure sees no boundaries, respects no territories, and is controlled by no one.

Like Levinas, Brian Massumi claims that once we insist on a subject-object divide, it immediately deepens into an abyss. An essential divide is presupposed the moment the categories of knower and known are overlaid upon the subject and the object, and no amount of subsequent maneuvering, however ingeniously contortionist, will smooth it over.

Bishop Barron recently wrote about an abyss he sees between contemporary activists and religion. "One of the most remarkable differences between the social protests of the 1960's and those of today is that the former were done in concert with, and often under the explicit leadership of, religious people," he writes.
